Two Poems
SUSAN BARBA

Final Letter of Stone

Human gestures.

To pick up a stone to see what’s underneath.

To pick up a stone and throw it in the stream.

Stone expelled through air hits the silence as it’s said      stone      breaks the stream’s skin

o where it entered

round echo

of its shape in the hand of its warmth from the sun of    regret

then the unvoiced

final letter of stone

before nothing

closes over it

no vestige of a beginning

no prospect of an end
e for
the abyssal eons

scribbled
in the roadcuts

the anthropocene’s antecedents abridged

what use is hope to a stone
forget ferns, moss
forget british soldiers, greenshield lichens of the hoarstone red rock has millions of years on them not the redwall of the north rim surface red

milkstone
but the epic redbed
redbed

desert diary
of the opening of the atlantic

seabed

sea diary
of land to be the stories, gods, family trees all about us

make tuning in
to this time scale
a refusal

but maybe it is a kind of eternity

the earth’s
Exhibit 4

In the ocotillo’s arms
the red cranes roost.
The desert is creosote
in a clay pot.

The clarity of a single plant, potted in sand
almost as old as dust,
mulched with pebbles

that remember their late rivers.
The plant is seconds old green stripling!
in the gnomic earth.